"This night, the little fellow ran forward and made an attempt to spike the rubberman again, but no intention of permitting to go as far as that. He wheeled sharply and darted off before Lissy's Light could be brought to bear on him."

"There no brave boy," the Gray said, approvingly. "I knew the ox would do that sort of thing."

"He's very much pleased with this second effort," said the Captain very solemnly.

"Did he do it?" asked the boy.

"I should be glad to see it."

"After that he would go on to an ox or a wildcat, but—"

"This wimping Gray's first lesson is enough," said the boy. "I saw that he was naturally timid, but he's got a little backbone. He's a little discouraged, and brashly anxious to show his stuff."

"Well, know, that is just what he needs."
